

A Tech Blog for the Rest of Us

Written by Johann Taylor
Monday, 27 June 2011 11:27

Our new website and blog is finally up and running! Please take a few minutes to check out the sites and let us know what you think. They can be found at CompuClinic.us and Rx.CompuClinic.us respectively.

At CompuClinic, our focus is, and always has been customer service, and this blog was founded with the purpose of helping our customers, and anyone else willing to listen, to use technology in a way that is safe, smart, and beneficial.

That being said, in order for us to help you, we need as much feedback as possible. Asking questions and commenting is not only encouraged, but essential to our success of meeting your needs. Our goal is to translate the technobabble you hear online and from the nerd down the street into something a little easier to understand. If we didn't explain something well enough, speak up in the comments! As the forum Tech Support Guy says, "There's no such thing as a stupid question, but they're the easiest to answer." Likewise, if we sound like we are explaining something to a 2-year old, let us know.

For a limited time, we are even giving away a $4 gift certificate to Farr's Fresh ice cream if we feature your question or comment in an article.

Unfortunately, we will have to avoid writing about specific issues that are best left to an experienced technician and will do our best to let you know when something is potentially dangerous. Our goal is to help you keep your computers running, not to help you break them. When a question or problem is too serious to be easily fixed by following simple instructions, or has the potential to cause data loss or permanent harm, we will gladly refer you to a local technician or our support team for a quote.

For questions about our business, or services, please see our main website at CompuClinic.us.